The development of the Hudson Region was supported by numerous individuals. Toronto, itself, although known for its industry, was well-known for its automotive history and its large population of immigrants, and was the center of the booming automobile industry of the time. Expansion of the settlement began immediately after the war, and by the late 1920s several townships, such as Markham, East York, New Toronto, North York, Cabbagetown, Flemingdon Park, and Uxbridge had been incorporated. Toronto's first city hall was constructed in 1858, but Toronto's present City Hall was first built in 1889-90. The telephone system was initially introduced in 1881 and a Toronto Telegram office was able to deliver a telegram to Buffalo, New York in just 4 hours. The Canadian Northern Railway arrived in Toronto in 1883 and provided the first railway into the city. The Canadian Pacific Railway (CPR) began service to Toronto in 1885, and CPR's rival, Grand Trunk Railway, arrived in 1889. In 1891, the Toronto Harbour Commission was established to oversee port operations. The Toronto Trade School was established in 1894 to train railroad conductors and rail traffic employees, and the Canadian National Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Northern Railway, and the Toronto Railway Commission were all established between 1895 and 1897. The Glenside Bridge in Queen's Park, designed by Thomas Seaton Scott and opened in 1907, linked Upper Canada to the growing city. The creation of the Victoria Bridge in 1915 connected Toronto with mainland Canada. The burgeoning population soon made the creation of the Metropolitan Toronto municipal government necessary. The first Council meeting was held on January 21, 1914, with the first mayor of Metropolitan Toronto being William Hepburn Lambton. Early in Toronto's history, it was largely governed by pro-union members of political parties. Because of the dominance of the right-wing Conservative Party of the day, the city was governed by Conservatives from its founding in 1834 until the municipal election of 1919. Conservative mayor John Sparrow David Thompson was defeated by a coalition of moderate candidates and led a drive to establish the Toronto Civic Centre, to create a more democratic governing structure. Only with the election of the reformist Liberal-Labour coalition of George Henry Brereton was Metropolitan Toronto established in January 1920. The 16th Canadian Parliament passed the City of Toronto Act in 1920, allowing Toronto to become a self-governing city and to spend its own tax money. The incorporation was affirmed by the
